The screenshot shows a web page from Tinybeans. At the top is a red navigation bar with the Tinybeans logo and various menu items like 'City Guide', 'Things to Do', 'Fun & Games', 'Shopping', 'Terms', 'Privacy', and 'Help'. There are also buttons for 'Start a Trial' and 'Sign In'. Below the navigation bar, the article title '7 Places to Visit to Responsibly Experience Native American Culture' is prominently displayed. The author is identified as Sabrina Hixson, and the date is November 3, 2022. A social media sharing bar is visible below the author information. To the right of the title is a large image of a young girl in a green shirt and a woman in a blue and white shawl, both smiling. Below the image is the caption 'Troyer/ South Dakota'. Underneath the image, the article's sub-headline reads: 'These historical sites, museums, and cultural centers are the perfect way for families to learn more about Native American culture'. The main body of text begins with: 'It's Native American Heritage Month every year, and while learning about Native culture shouldn't be restricted to a month every year, it's certainly a time to spotlight the many Native American communities and their rich histories. This is a time to focus on their diverse heritage and important contributions and learn as much as we can as well as visit our children to respect and celebrate the Native American communities that have always called these lands their home. Here are a few venues where you can do that responsibly, and the kids can benefit from an immersive educational experience that aids their learning as well.' The first featured location is the 'Indian Pueblo Cultural Center | New Mexico'. Below this heading is an image of two dancers in traditional Pueblo attire performing on a dirt stage. The caption below the image is 'Visit ABQ'. The text continues: 'Native Americans have inhabited the region now known as New Mexico for thousands of years, and their presence is felt throughout the state. This culture is reflected in nearly every aspect of life within Albuquerque—from the city's art and architecture to its festivals and culinary traditions. This influence extends into the present day among New Mexico's 20 Native American pueblos, tribes, and Nations, ensuring this way of life continues to endure.' The article concludes with a 'Kids will love:' section: 'Kids can meet artists selling handcrafted works, experience dance performances and lessons, and savor unique contemporary Indigenous meals at the on-site full-service Indian Pueblo Kitchen restaurant.' At the bottom, there is an 'Online:' link: 'IndianPuebloCulturalCenter.com'. A QR code is located in the bottom right corner of the screenshot area.
